Nursing consultants are registered nurses who have had specialized training in occupational health. They are well qualified to advise about the kind of occupational health services a company needs, whether it is starting a new health service or trying to improve an existing service. This counselling service is free.

Getting in Touch

More information on any aspect of occupational health nursing is available from the nursing consultant in your area. If you want to discuss a health service for your company or health problems related to work, feel free to call or write, and we will arrange for a consultant to visit.

Helping Others to Help

Good health is important to everyone and is the key to both personal and business success. Personal health is our own responsibility, but health care professionals can help us in many ways to adopt healthy lifestyles and follow healthy work practices. The Ministry of Labour's nursing consultants can help you to deal with job-related health problems.

Saving Time and Money

Occupational health programs pay off. Even in a small business, a good program can:

- reduce lost time due to illness;
- help to prevent accidents;
- lower absenteeism;
- secure a faster return to work after an accident;
- improve morale;
- improve productivity.

Consulting Service

The Ministry's occupational health nursing consultants can help business managers decide on the type of occupational health program best suited to their businesses and advise them on how to establish and operate the program. Nursing consultants can:

- advise on steps to take to correct health problems;
- suggest staffing for the program;
- recommend equipment and facilities;
- provide information on the maintenance of medical records;
- help to establish co-operative programs in groups of small companies.

The advisory services are also available to workers and their representatives. Workers can discuss their health concerns and how they may be affected by the workplace.
